Throughout history there has been both a lack of representation from diverse populations in research and mistreatment of those who were included. This forum will discuss the importance of including diverse populations in research studies and public health interventions. We will discuss the historical issues that have contributed to low representation. Hear from community members from the Somali and Mexican Immigrant communities as they share their experiences engaging with academic institutions. We will learn how voices from the community can help shift the narrative to ensure that communities are thoughtfully engaged.
